MIRROR LAKE

◆ Overview ◆

Mirror Lake is one of downtown St. Petersburg's oldest civic landscapes. Before it became a park, it served as part of the city's early water system and was known as Reservoir Lake. As St. Petersburg grew in the early 1900s, the area was intentionally planned as a residential park setting, avoiding the commercial density typical of downtown growth.

Much of the shoreline falls within the Mirror Lake Local Historic District (historic overlay), where exterior changes and new development are reviewed to ensure the neighborhood's scale, rhythm, and architectural character remain cohesive. On calm days, the water often lives up to its name, reflecting the surrounding trees and skyline like a mirror, and the shoreline is an active habitat for birds and other urban wildlife.
